1963 Census of Manufactures United States. Bureau of the Census,1966 Trade, Exchange Rate, and Agricultural Pricing Policies in Thailand 'Ammā Sayāmwālā,Suthad Setboonsarng,1989 Thailand is still largely an agricultural country In 1984 agricultural work was still the main source of earnings for more than 70 percent of the population For much of the 25 year period covered by this report government intervention in the prices of rice maize and natural rubber was extensive For these products intervention took the form of explicit export taxes and restrictive quotas Sugar on the other hand was imported until 1960 For many years prior to that government policy was to encourage growers and thus achieve self sufficiency One conclusion of this study is that the Thai sugar industry would have shrunk dramatically if the government had refrained from intervention Intervention in the prices of rice and natural rubber had the effect of penalizing farm producers by reducing their output prices There was as a consequence a shift of resources towards Thailand s small industrial sector In 1981 the Thai government lifted its quota restrictions and liberalized its trade by eliminating its intervention in the maize rice sugar and natural rubber markets Unfortunately for export growers however the gradual elimination of intervention was overshadowed by sharp declines in the world prices of Thailand s major agricultural exports Current List of Medical
