Allocating resources goods agents e g humans expertise production and assets is one of the most influential and enduring cornerstone challenges at the intersection of artificial intelligence operations research politics and economics At its core as highlighted by a number of seminal works 181 164 125 32 128 159 109 209 129 131 is a timeless question How can we best allocate indivisible entities such as objects items commodities jobs or personnel so that the outcome is as valuable as possible be it in terms of expected utility fairness or overall societal welfare This thesis confronts this inquiry from multiple algorithmic viewpoints focusing on the value maximizing combinatorial assignment problem the optimization challenge of partitioning a set of indivisibles among alternatives to maximize a given notion of value To exemplify consider a scenario where an international aid organization is responsible for distributing medical resources such as ventilators and vaccines and allocating medical personnel including doctors and nurses to hospitals during a global health crisis These resources and personnel inherently indivisible and non fragmentable necessitate an allocation process designed to optimize utility and fairness Rather than using manual interventions and ad hoc methods which often lack precision and scalability a rigorously developed and demonstrably performant approach can often be more desirable With this type of challenge in mind our thesis begins through the lens of computational complexity theory commencing with an initial insight In general under prevailing complexity theoretic assumptions $P \neq NP$ it is impossible to develop an efficient method guaranteeing a value maximizing allocation that is better than arbitrarily bad even under severely constraining limitations and simplifications This inapproximability result not only underscores the problem's complexity but also sets the stage for our ensuing work wherein we develop novel algorithms and concise representations for utilitarian egalitarian and Nash welfare maximization problems aimed at maximizing average equitable and balanced utility respectively For example we introduce the synergy hypergraph a hypergraph based characterization of utilitarian combinatorial assignment which allows us to prove several new state of the art complexity results to help us better understand how hard the problem is We then provide efficient approximation algorithms and non trivial exponential time algorithms for many hard cases In addition we explore complexity bounds for generalizations with interdependent effects between allocations known as externalities in economics Natural applications in team formation resource allocation and combinatorial auctions are also discussed and a novel bootstrapped dynamic programming method is introduced We then transition from theory to practice as we shift our focus to the utilitarian variant of the problem an incarnation of the problem particularly applicable to many real world scenarios For this variation we achieve substantial empirical algorithmic improvements over existing methods including industry grade solvers This work culminates in the development of a new hybrid algorithm that combines dynamic programming with branch and bound techniques that is demonstrably faster than all competing methods in finding both optimal and near optimal allocations across a wide range of experiments For example it solves one of our most challenging problem sets in just 0.25% of the time required by the previous best methods representing an improvement of approximately 2.6 orders of magnitude in processing speed Additionally we successfully integrate and commercialize our algorithm into Europa Universalis IV one of the world's most popular strategy games with a player base exceeding millions In this dynamic and challenging setting our algorithm efficiently manages complex strategic agent interactions highlighting its potential to improve computational efficiency and decision making in real time multi agent scenarios This also represents one of the first instances where a combinatorial assignment algorithm has been applied in a commercial context We then introduce and evaluate several highly efficient heuristic algorithms These algorithms while lacking provable quality guarantees employ general purpose heuristic and random sampling techniques to significantly outperform existing methods in both speed and quality in large input scenarios For instance in one of our most challenging problem sets involving a thousand indivisibles our best algorithm generates outcomes that are 99.5% of the expected optimal in just seconds This performance is particularly noteworthy when compared to state of the art industry grade solvers which struggle to produce any outcomes under similar conditions Further advancing our work we employ novel machine learning techniques to generate new heuristics that outperform the best hand crafted ones This approach not only showcases the potential of machine learning in combinatorial optimization but also sets a new standard for combinatorial assignment heuristics to be used in real world scenarios demanding rapid high quality decisions such as in logistics real time tactics and finance In summary this thesis bridges many gaps between the theoretical and practical aspects of combinatorial assignment problems such as those found in coalition formation combinatorial auctions welfare maximizing resource allocation and assignment problems It deepens the understanding of the computational complexities involved and provides effective and improved solutions for longstanding real world challenges across various sectors providing new algorithms applicable in fields ranging from artificial intelligence to logistics finance and digital entertainment while simultaneously paving the way for future work in computational problem solving and optimization
