And if platelets are cells which all specialists consider at the time being are they immune cells? The issue that platelets participate in immunity is no longer debated; however, the issue that they are key cells in immunity is challenged. It has even been proposed a couple of years ago that platelets can present antigen to T lymphocytes by using their HLA class I molecules. No one has the same functional definition of platelets. The Frontiers Research Topic coordinators' own view is that platelets are primarily repairing cells what they do in deploying tools of physiological inflammation. This function is better acknowledged as primary hemostasis i.e., platelet adherence to injured or wounded vessels followed by activation, aggregation, and constitution of the initial clot. Platelets would thus repair damaged vascular endothelium so doing as they patrol to detect damages they sense danger along the vascular arborescence. As the latter is immense, platelets get close to tissues which are not allowed to them under physiological conditions but are readily accessible in pathology. Platelets are equipped with a variety of Pathogen Recognition Receptors such as TLRs they have a complete signalosome which is functional until the phosphorylation of NFkB they have been proved to retro transcribe RNA and synthesize de novo proteins etc Platelets participate to inflammation along the whole spectrum from physiological tissue repair healing to acute severe inflammation as can be seen in e g sepsis In general platelets engage complex interactions with most infectious pathogens We propose there to cover those topics from physiology to pathology that put platelets within cells that not only take place in but also are key players of innate immunity The relation of platelets with adaptive immunity is even more complex Not everyone is convinced that platelets present antigens however platelets influence adaptive immunity since they have mutual interactions with Dendritic cells Monocytes Macrophages and B lymphocytes the key players of antigen presentation they also have mutual interactions with T lymphocytes though is issue is less clearly deciphered We propose to also cover these topics or to present the forum There is another issue which is medically relevant speaking of physiology physiopathology this is fetal maternal incompatibility of platelet specific antigens the HPA system and the likely formation of maternal antibodies that often injure the newborn with risks of severe thrombocytopenia and intracranial hemorrhage We propose an update on this issue as well Last platelets are very special because they can be directly therapeutic by transfusion even when being offered by a generous blood donor displaying given genetic and phenotypic parameters to a patient recipient in need who also display his her own genetic and phenotypic parameters which for a large part differ from the donor s ones Besides immunization via mechanisms probably close to the fetal maternal platelet incompatibility but likely not similar transfusion has allowed the identification of the tremendous capacity of platelets to mediate inflammation we propose to conclude the Topics with this item forum

Carbohydrates: the yet to be tasted sweet spot of immunity Deirdre R Coombe,Christopher R Parish,2015-07-10 Carbohydrates are extremely abundant bio molecules they are on all mammalian cell surfaces as well as on bacterial cell surfaces In mammals most secreted proteins are glycosylated with the glycan component comprising a significant amount by mass of the glycoprotein Although many years ago carbohydrate protein recognition events were demonstrated as involved in invertebrate self non self recognition the contribution of carbohydrate protein binding events to the mechanisms of the mammalian immune response was not embraced with the same enthusiasm Adaptive immunity and the contribution of antibodies T cells and T lymphocyte sub sets and protein antigen presentation dominated immunological theory Unlike protein structures carbohydrate structures are not template driven yet the numerous enzymes involved in carbohydrate biosynthesis and modification are encoded by a major component of the genome and the expression of these enzymes is tightly regulated As a consequence carbohydrate structures are also regulated with different structures appearing according to the stage of cell differentiation and according to the age or health of the individual The advent of technologies that have allowed carbohydrate structures and carbohydrate protein binding events to be more easily interrogated has resulted in these types of interactions taking their place in modern immunology We now know that glycans and their ligands or lectins are involved in numerous immunological pathways of both the innate and adaptive systems However it is clear that our understanding is still in its infancy as more and more examples where carbohydrate structures contribute to aspects of the immune response are being recognised The goal of this research topic is to explore the variety of roles undertaken by glycans and lectins in all aspects of the immune response The particular focus is how the interactions of glycans with their ligands contribute to the mechanism of immune responses
